

SCHRADER ADVISORS GROUP

HELPING YOU DISCOVER THE NEXT LEG OF YOUR JOURNEY

It's Your Career

“Let's talk about you.”

When was the last time your boss said that?

After all, this is your life and how you spend it should be up to you. Of course you have to work and earn a living. And the life style you chose needs to be supported by that paycheck.

But are you living YOUR life?

In Dan Fogelberg's tribute to his father (The Leader of the Bad) Dan expresses that his passion for music as the purpose of his life has given him insight into his father's past which he only now truly understands.

Most of us are passionate about something but circumstances sidetrack us and we end up going down different paths than expected. While that may be an unfortunate choice when we first start our work life, eventually, there comes a point when we have an opportunity for change. It may be after the kids are in high school or college or out of the house. There is no set time frame and it is never too late.

Dan sings about having regret for not reaching out to his father more often. And eventually we will all face that point in time. Do you really want to have that regret that you didn't at least try to follow your passion.

Now, I'm not recommending that you drop everything and runoff to re-live Woodstock. Perhaps you can channel that inner passion into your current situation and make it more pleasurable.

So how do you do that? It's not an easy solution that you can come up with in five minutes. It takes time to understand your passion and translate it into something manageable. My recommendation, and the purpose of this short piece, is to suggest that you find a Career Coach who is trained to help guide you down that path. A Career Coach will work with you to help you understand your passion and how to mold it into your life so that you can have more satisfaction in your career. (Notice it is all about you) It's worth a discussion.

More at www.richardjschrader.com

Rick Schrader, Schrader Advisors Group